First Night at Theaters

Somehow it must have got rumored around that "Going Up" was worth while, for, though the new musical play is only two weeks old, the National Theater was thronged last night, and somebody must have tipped off the President, for he and Mra. Wilson were among those present. Everybody was pleased with the lively, taughable, original performance, which has the exhilarating quality characteristic of a Cohan and Harris production.

by the way, is a very pretty openature.

In singular sympathy with the romantie school employed by Mr. Herther is the story, which runs with remarkable coherence through "Eilem," furnishing an attractive thread in the weaving of the operatic garment, following as it does the provent in Erin. The romance between Barry O'Day, an Irish patriot, and Eileen Mulvaney forms the frame-production.

which has the exhilarating quality characteristic of a Cohan and Harris production. "Going Up" has the unusual merit for a mulcal comedy of telling a story that holds the attention and even offers excitement. It is founded on a play by James Montgomery, called "The Aviator," and it is all about flying. Just why aviation has gone all these years without making matter for a musical show cannot be told, especially after seeing this one. Anybody can see now that going up in aeroplanes is just the thing to no. Anybody can see now that going up in aeroplanes is just the thing to sing and dance about.

Frank Craven, whose fame as a farceur is bright in these parts, is cast as Robert Street, author of a popular book named "Going Up," whom circumstances at a summer hotel have impelled to pretend that he himself has had all the experiences of his aviator hero. A big wager is laid on the outcome of a race in the air between him and Jules Galliard, a real French fiver, and furthermore he has fallen in love with a girl who believes he is all that he pretends. So when his friends who concocted the scheme lose heart he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists or carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on carrying it through, and with a few hours' instructions he insists on car

"Well," continued Jim, "that girl's description of the husband showed that she understood men, that she had a pretty sane judgment of life and that she understood men, that she had a pretty sane judgment of life and things generally. She said of him: "He drank more than was good for him, was as affectionate as a dog and always good-humored.
